In this study we sought to determine the diagnostic accuracy of stress echocardiography (SE) in patients with suspected coronary artery disease (CAD). Stress-induced wall motion abnormalities on SE have been shown to predict the presence of CAD and also the severity of CAD. However, its diagnostic performance in terms of predictive accuracy has never been reported in a large multicenter study. A total of 1273 consecutive patients referred for SE underwent coronary angiography within a median of 4 weeks (12 h) after SE. All SE were performed with the patient in a semi-supine position using the standard protocol. Left ventricular (LV) wall motion was determined with either free-wall-tracking (FWT) or standard multiple-chamber 2-DSE and 3-DSE (with harmonic imaging). Receiver-operating-characteristic (ROC) curves and sensitivity and specificity were calculated for the predictive value of single-plane views and 6 standardized wall motion patterns and compared with the summed stress score (SSS). Of the 1273 patients, 50% had
